

President Next

July 22, 2024

I've never liked Joe Biden. Not as a U.S. Senator, or Vice-President, or President. But I'll be the first to acknowledge that his decision, announced yesterday, to relinquish his party's presidential nomination, which he was set to formally receive at the Democratic National Convention next month, was the right thing to do.

Way to go, Joe!

First, however, Democratic Party bigshots decided—most importantly with money—that Mr. Biden was not cognitively up to the mighty arduous task of running for president. This fact became ever clearer to many Democrat representatives and senators the more they envisioned themselves becoming collateral political damage.

President Biden held out against their calls for his ouster for weeks after that fateful June debate. The subsequent campaign stops and high-profile interviews designed to showcase his abilities illustrated, instead, that our commander-in-chief was frail, feeble, feckless.

Now the president has endorsed his Vice President Kamala Harris to be the Democrat's new standard bearer this fall. Still, stay tuned for an interesting DNC convention where Harris may face other challengers for the nomination.

And, as Detective Columbo used to say, "Just one more thing."

There has been no word on whether in the coming days, not weeks, we will see the first female president of these United States, Kamala Harris.

If Democrats are too scared to have Biden as their leader this fall, should the American people really be okay with Biden sticking around for six months to be ours? Giving national and world leadership a continued go?

Thanks, but no thanks. Hello, President Harris.

This is Common Sense. I'm Paul Jacob.
