

Hating X: The Naked Truth

January 16, 2026

Why do so many U.S. Democrats, like some Europeans, want to outlaw X?

The current stage of the U.S. assault on the social media platform formerly known as Twitter takes the form of senatorial demands that X be removed from iOS and Android app stores.

Why the enmity?

Well, under the ownership of Elon Musk, X lets people say and write stuff that Democrats dislike. Such as criticism of Democratic policies and politicians, just the kind of speech the First Amendment was drafted to protect. (Criticism of Republican, Libertarian, communist, and anarchist policies and politicians? Also protected.)

The rationalization for the proposed ban is that X's AI software, Grok, can generate pictures of nude or nearly nude people.

The ability to generate such images is hardly unique to this particular chatbot. If X is to be banned from app stores because of the possibility that users may post generated nudes on the platform, many more social media platforms would, logically, also have to be snared by the censorship net.

Yet, reports Reclaim the Net, the letter sent to the CEOs of Apple and Google "by Senators Ron Wyden, Ben Ray Lujan, and Ed Markey asked the tech giants only about X and demanded that the companies remove X from their app stores entirely."

Unsurprisingly, X has announced that the nude-ifying feature of Grok has been limited. I asked Grok, and it said that "there is now a taboo/restriction on generating or editing nudes (or near-nudes/revealing attire) of real, existing people from photos. It will refuse prompts to digitally 'undress' or sexualize identifiable real individuals. Attempts often result in refusal, blurring, or error messages."

Fixed?

This is Common Sense. I'm Paul Jacob.
