

#ThemToo Movement

March 10, 2026

No matter how partisan politics has become, there are a few issues that our politicians seem intent on supporting — or opposing — regardless of party.

Example? Consider how soundly the House scuttled the recent effort to bring transparency to taxpayer payoffs for representatives' and senators' sexual harassment, rapes, and other improprieties.

Last Wednesday, 357 members of the House of Representatives voted to refer to a committee a resolution that would have forced the release of records related to sexual harassment claims against lawmakers. While that sounds innocuous, in this case it effectively killed the measure. That's how Representative Thomas Massie (R-Tenn.) explained it, and that's how it was reported in the news: everyone who voted to refer the resolution to committee knew they were sending it to die.

"Both parties colluded to protect predators," lamented Rep. Nancy Mace (R-S.C.), who had introduced the resolution. "They voted to keep sexual harassment records buried, and they did it together."

How together? Well the 357 members who protected their comrades from the ire of their constituents included 175 Republicans and 182 Democrats. Remember that there are currently 218 Republicans serving in Congress and 213 Democrats (with three vacancies and no independent representation). Nine members did not vote, while one answered as merely "present."

The uncooperative Republicans (willing to stab members of their own party in the back!) numbered thirty-eight, while recalcitrant Democrats (cruelly eager to shine sunlight on their fellow vampires!) numbered twenty-seven.

While the House overwhelmingly voted to protect its members from transparency and their own voters, back on November 18, 2025, representatives voted 427-1 to demand the immediate release of all federal documents related to Jeffrey Epstein.

Even more bipartisan. But that time it was for transparency.

Just not theirs.

This is key.

And this is Common Sense. I'm Paul Jacob.
